

Make It Happen Studio

Business Understanding

What does the studio do?

Make It Happen Studio turns idea-stage founders' concepts into working MVPs in 14 days. I design the product in Figma and build it with Claude Code — solo, end-to-end. Founders walk away with a working URL their users can actually use, the Figma designs behind it, and the codebase to keep building from.

Who is your ideal client?

Idea-stage founders — usually solo or very early — who have a clear product idea but no working version of it yet. They want something real to put in front of users or investors, not a slide deck or a clickable mockup. They value speed, taste, and someone who can do design and build under one roof. They're often technical-adjacent but not full engineers, and they're frustrated by the gap between Lovable-style prototypes (too rough) and full dev shops (too slow and expensive).

What kind of work do you want the studio to be known for?

Shipping the first real version of an idea, fast. The studio should be known as the place where idea-stage founders go when they want a working MVP that doesn't feel like a hack — designed with care, built end-to-end, and handed off as something they can actually grow from.

What's the bigger vision for the studio?

To be the trusted partner for founders at the moment they need to turn an idea into something real. Long-term, this means expanding from the productized front door (The First Build) into ongoing product partnerships — being the studio founders keep coming back to as they scale from MVP to product-market fit. The studio could grow to a small team (Jerel as PM, possibly engineers), but it stays craft-led and idea-stage focused rather than chasing enterprise work.

Brand Direction

How do you want people to feel when they see the brand?

Three layered feelings, in order:

1. This person knows what she's doing. Confidence, taste, seriousness about the work.
2. I can actually afford and access this. Approachable, plainspoken, not corporate or precious.
3. This is going to be fun. A bit of warmth and personality. Not a faceless agency.

The combination of those three is the differentiator. Most studios hit one or two; few hit all three.

What 3 words should describe the brand?

Plainspoken. Crafted. Confident.

Honest, taste-led, sure of itself without being loud.

Are there brands or studios you admire?

- studio.design — for quiet craft and how a small studio earns trust through restraint. The opposite of agency energy.
- Brickroad Studio — for the multi-color system in action: teal-led with supporting accents
- designjoy.co — for productized clarity. Pricing visible, scope clear, no mystery. Want to borrow the structural transparency, not the aesthetic.
- pitch.com — for confident bold typography that still reads serious and trustworthy.

What styles or directions do you want to avoid?

- AI-cliché visuals: gradient meshes, glowing nodes, abstract neural-network illustrations
  - Stock 3D renders, generic illustrations, AI-generated imagery
  - Overly cute or decorative — no mascots, no character illustrations
  - Corporate-agency tone — no "we empower," "end-to-end solutions," "transformative"
  - Pure black-and-white minimalism with no warmth (would feel cold, given the work is for early founders)
  - Sticker-pack / DTC-energy-drink aesthetic (love it as a reference for energy, not for the studio itself)

Business Name + Context

Why did you choose the name "Make It Happen Studio"?

"Make It Happen" captures what idea-stage founders actually need — not advice, not strategy decks, not endless validation — they need someone to make the thing. The phrase is action-first, plainspoken, and free of jargon. "Studio" anchors it as a craft practice, not an agency or consultancy.

What does "Make It Happen" represent to you?

The gap I'm closing. Founders have ideas and don't know how to get them into the world. "Make it happen" is the promise to bridge that gap — to be the partner who actually ships something real, not the one who talks about shipping. It's also a personal value: I'd rather build the thing than over-plan the thing.

Should the brand feel more creative, premium, bold, minimal, or execution-focused?

Bold + execution-focused, with a creative undercurrent.

Bold in the wordmark and confidence. Execution-focused in the messaging (clear deliverables, real timelines, transparent pricing). Creative shows up in the details — the type choices, the copy voice, the small moments — not in the headline aesthetic. Definitely not minimal-cold or premium-precious.

Usage

Where will the brand mainly be used?

- Website (makeithappenstudio.io — the main asset)
- Social presence — primarily Threads, X, and LinkedIn for client acquisition
- Client deliverables — proposal docs, case studies, invoices, the codebase handoff doc
- Light merch eventually — stickers, shirt, maybe a tote

What deliverables do you need for launch?

- Primary wordmark (full: "Make It Happen Studio") or Make It Happen
- Short wordmark or monogram (for favicons, social avatars, tight spaces)
- Logo lockup variations (light bg, dark bg, single color)
- Brand color system (primary + supporting, with hex values)

- Type system recommendation (display + body, with weights)
  - A small set of brand elements if appropriate (a mark, a pattern, a stamp/badge — only if it serves the system, not for decoration)
  - File deliverables: SVG, PNG (transparent), brand guidelines doc

Align Direction

What would make this branding project successful for you?

Three things:

1. The brand makes founders trust me enough to send the deposit. The wordmark and visual system have to do real selling work — they're carrying weight on a solo studio with no public case studies yet.
2. The system is flexible enough that I can apply it myself across the website, social, and client docs without needing the designer for every new asset.
3. It looks like me and feels like me — not a generic studio template. I'd rather have something distinctive and slightly imperfect than something polished and forgettable.

What impression do you want people to have when they first discover the studio?

"Oh — this is a real, considered studio run by someone who actually ships." Not "this is an agency." Not "this is a freelancer." A studio with a point of view, a clear offer, and the craft to back it up.

Who will make the final decisions for the brand?

Me (Luisa). Solo decision-maker for now.

Notes for the designer

- The wordmark will likely be the most-used asset. The studio name is long ("Make It Happen Studio" = four words). Please think about a primary lockup and a tighter version (maybe "MIH" monogram or just "Make It Happen") for tight spaces. The full name doesn't have to do every job.
- Multi-color system, not two-color. The palette is teal-led but supports pink, yellow, and black as accents — not a strict two-color brand. The Stripe reference is the closest example for how the colors should behave across the system.
